Synopsis :

Review Marketing films requires a combination of art, science, and showmanship, which Marketing to Moviegoers explains in a comprehensive way. The book lays out the processes involved and enlivens them with real-world examples.”—Tom Sherak, former president of the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences“Marketing to Moviegoers provides practical information across a range of functions including the process of audience testing of marketing materials, details about advertising campaigns, and metrics of theatrical distribution.”—Al Lieberman, professor of marketing, executive director, Entertainment, Media and Technology Program, Stern School of Business, NYU“Marketing to Moviegoers pulls together the various facets of movie marketing campaigns in a systematic manner. It lays out the structure and order, while providing useful data and historical context.”—Jack Valenti, former chairman, Motion Picture Association of America Read more About the Author Author Robert Marich observes that Hollywood spends more money to market its films worldwide than is spent to make the films themselves. Yet, marketing movies is often overlooked. Marich is a business journalist and analyst with twenty-five years of experience covering film and media. He has held senior editorial jobs at media researcher Kagan Research, Variety Deal Memo film business newsletter, daily trade newspaper Hollywood Reporter, and a number of other publications. His freelance articles have appeared in Variety, London-based Screen International, the business section of the Los Angeles Times, Emmy magazine, and Forbes. Marich also authored More Than Just A Kiss.
